SPECIFIC DOS AND DON’TS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>HOW CAN YOU HELP? WHAT YOU CAN DO OR SAY.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>There is absolutely nothing wrong with asking regularly how the person is, or more specifically, how they are today. If you tell someone that you are there for them, then do take the trouble to contact them and ask how they are right now. Do the same again after a few months, because it is important to acknowledge that this is a long term process.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Give the grieving person the time to express their feelings, whether this is anger or sadness. The important thing is just to be there. Show that you can see the grieving person’s sorrow, and acknowledge that there is also room for quiet.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>How can you help? What you can do or say.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>If you don't know what to say, then just say that you don't know what to say. Or say 'I feel really awkward about this, but would you like to talk about it?' Then at least you are acknowledging the person's grief.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>If you don't know what to say, then just say that you don't know what to say. Or say 'I feel really awkward about this, but would you like to talk about it?' Then at least you are acknowledging the person's grief.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do not say: 'If there's anything you need, just let me know.' But: 'I'm going shopping, is there anything I can get you?' Or 'Shall I take this meeting for you?'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I would happily cook you a meal, what sort of thing you like?'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do not say: 'Are you feeling better now?' But: 'How are you doing today?'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Are you managing okay?'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do not say: 'Give me a call!' But: 'If it's okay with you, I'll give you a call every night at 8 PM.'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'I heard that X passed away, that must have been terrible for you. I would like to be there for you.'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do not say: 'I can imagine that...' But: 'I just don't know what to say.'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'I'm here for you, and if there's anything practical I can do, I will.'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do not say: 'Tell me more about your father/brother/...?' But: 'How is your father doing now?' This opens a conversation.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Get together with your colleagues and agree how you can all help out with work and provide support in the workplace.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Loss and grief are difficult to talk about. So difficult, in fact, that we would often rather remove ourselves from the situation, or, instead, we resort to well-meaning but pointless platitudes. ‘Ancient wisdom’ we sometimes call it, but thought-killing cliché is another way of saying ‘do you feel like taking a little walk?’. Suggest things that you can actually deliver on, like ‘shall I bring you some soup over, later?’ When people are grieving they are sometimes too wrapped up in their emotions to ask for help.

Try to keep in step with the grieving person, but don’t be afraid to suggest something that might be fun. Don’t say ‘just call me any time’ or ‘if there’s anything you need’, because no one feels up to that when they are grief stricken. Make the call yourself, go knock on their door or send a message. It is best to suggest something specific, like ‘do you feel like taking a little walk?’. Suggest things that you can actually deliver on, like ‘shall I bring you some soup over, later?’ When people are grieving they are sometimes too wrapped up in their emotions to ask for help.

Give your colleague time
Grief is a long, drawn-out process, and one that everyone goes through in their own way. Do not congratulate a grieving colleague if their sadness appears briefly to have lifted. Many people feel desperately guilty in that moment and would certainly not appreciate having it pointed out to them. You can say that you are happy to see them back at work, and this in itself can be very encouraging without implying that the grieving process is over. Remind yourself to check how things are by putting a note in your diary several weeks or months ahead. Every grieving person has occasions when it all wells up again, such as a birthday, or a holiday. Show understanding in these difficult times. Loss fades, but it never ‘goes away’. Be patient.

Most importantly, don’t do nothing
It can sometimes be difficult, as a colleague or manager, to find the right words or get a sense of what the person might need. But don’t let that prevent you from saying or doing anything. Even if you sound awkward or self-conscious, they will appreciate your support and sympathy more than inaction. If you don’t know what to say, then just say that you don’t know what to say. Don’t be afraid to open old wounds or spoil a happy moment. Remain open to genuine conversation. Displaying your engagement is just as important as uttering the right words.

Steer clear of clichés
Loss and grief are difficult to talk about. So difficult, in fact, that we would often rather remove ourselves from the situation, or, instead, we resort to well-meaning but pointless platitudes. ‘Ancient wisdom’ we sometimes call it, but thought-killing cliché is another way of saying it. Things like ‘time heals the scars’, ‘you’ll get through it’, or ‘life goes on’. Such comments are stand-off-ish, because what you are actually saying is: ‘Hurry up! Get better soon!’, and, by doing that, you are denying the person’s grief. It is important to acknowledge grief, and to accept that it isn’t going to go away soon. Try not to give advice or talk about your own experiences, unless the person asks you to. The most important thing is to listen and to show that you are there.

Let them know that you are there, and offer practical help
There are several ways to show your sympathy and support. Send an email to say that you are thinking about them. Choose a quiet time to start up a conversation or make a small gesture such as helping out with some paperwork or fetching a cup of soup. Let them know that you are available to offer a listening ear or a shoulder to cry on, but also let it be known that you are happy to be there without anything being said.

Try to keep in step with the grieving person, but don’t be afraid to suggest something that might be fun. Don’t say ‘just call me any time’ or ‘if there’s anything you need’, because no one feels up to that when they are grief stricken. Make the call yourself, go knock on their door or send a message. It is best to suggest something specific, like ‘do you feel like taking a little walk?’. Suggest things that you can actually deliver on, like ‘shall I bring you some soup over, later?’ When people are grieving they are sometimes too wrapped up in their emotions to ask for help.

Most importantly, don’t do nothing
It can sometimes be difficult, as a colleague or manager, to find the right words or get a sense of what the person might need. But don’t let that prevent you from saying or doing anything. Even if you sound awkward or self-conscious, they will appreciate your support and sympathy more than inaction. If you don’t know what to say, then just say that you don’t know what to say. Don’t be afraid to open old wounds or spoil a happy moment. Remain open to genuine conversation. Displaying your engagement is just as important as uttering the right words.

Steer clear of clichés
Loss and grief are difficult to talk about. So difficult, in fact, that we would often rather remove ourselves from the situation, or, instead, we resort to well-meaning but pointless platitudes. ‘Ancient wisdom’ we sometimes call it, but thought-killing cliché is another way of saying it. Things like ‘time heals the scars’, ‘you’ll get through it’, or ‘life goes on’. Such comments are stand-off-ish, because what you are actually saying is: ‘Hurry up! Get better soon!’, and, by doing that, you are denying the person’s grief. It is important to acknowledge grief, and to accept that it isn’t going to go away soon. Try not to give advice or talk about your own experiences, unless the person asks you to. The most important thing is to listen and to show that you are there.

Give yourself permission to grieve
Be kind to yourself, and accept that it will be a while before you get back to 100%. Grieving takes up a lot of energy and it is hard work, which takes a toll on your mind and body. It can make an ordinary day quite intense. Make sure you get enough rest, and don’t feel guilty if you can’t handle those ‘ordinary’ tasks. It is only normal to worry about falling behind on a given task or missing a deadline. So it can help to ask for support, from People & Organisation for example.

Decide whether or not you are comfortable to talk about your loss
Do you like it when your colleagues ask how you are? Or is the loss still too painful to talk about? Give your colleagues or manager a ‘heads up’ on how you feel about it. This will give them the chance to consider your needs.

Don’t be afraid to ask for help
It is not always easy for the people around you to see exactly what you need. Is it a good, long talk, or some help with your work? Discuss it with your colleagues, tell your boss or speak to a confidant about it (see further).

Take your time
Getting back to work is a process. Things go well some days, and you are ready to take on the world. Then you relapse the next day and things go badly. That is entirely normal, and a part of the grieving process. Do not put yourself under too much pressure, and make time for yourself when you need it. It is important to readjust your work schedule to suit your needs. Prioritise your own well-being.

VUB initiatives on grief and loss can be found at this website: Compassionate University | Vrije Universiteit Brussel (vub.be). For example, VUB holds an annual remembrance service at the monument of troost or comfort. You can find support at the ‘Monument of Comfort’ on Etterbeek campus, a spot where you can always take time out for yourself.

WOULD YOU LIKE SOME EXTRA SUPPORT?

If grief and loss have left you facing a brick wall at work, and you would like to speak to someone at VUB about it, get in touch at [I would like to speak to someone] Ik wil met iemand spreken (sharepoint.com). P&O can also refer you to BRUCC Well-being, the team of psychologists that serve the VUB community.

You can also see a psychologist on campus, through Brucc@vub.be, or find one in the neighbourhood: Find a psychologist | VVKP. Are you having doubts about asking for help? Send an email to Bruccwelzijn@vub.be, and we will help you further.

You also have free and anonymous access to Tele-Onthaal (106 or at www.teleonthaal.be) and the suicide line (1813, or www.zelfmoord1813.be) where you can ask any questions you may have about suicidal thoughts or if you have lost a loved one after a suicide.

WHAT IF SOMEONE ON YOUR TEAM IS GRIEVING?

- Let them know that you are there, and offer practical help
  There are several ways to show your sympathy and support. Send an email to say that you are thinking about them. Choose a quiet time to start up a conversation or make a small gesture such as helping out with some paperwork or fetching a cup of soup. Let them know that you are available to offer a listening ear or a shoulder to cry on, but also let it be known that you are happy to be there without anything being said.

- Steer clear of clichés
  It can sometimes be difficult, as a colleague or manager, to find the right words or get a sense of what the person might need. But don’t let that prevent you from saying or doing anything. Even if you sound awkward or self-conscious, they will appreciate your support and sympathy more than inaction. If you don’t know what to say, then just say that you don’t know what to say. Don’t be afraid to open old wounds or spoil a happy moment. Remain open to genuine conversation. Displaying your engagement is just as important as uttering the right words.

- Most importantly, don’t do nothing
  It can sometimes be difficult, as a colleague or manager, to find the right words or get a sense of what the person might need. But don’t let that prevent you from saying or doing anything. Even if you sound awkward or self-conscious, they will appreciate your support and sympathy more than inaction. If you don’t know what to say, then just say that you don’t know what to say. Don’t be afraid to open old wounds or spoil a happy moment. Remain open to genuine conversation. Displaying your engagement is just as important as uttering the right words.

- Steer clear of clichés
  Loss and grief are difficult to talk about. So difficult, in fact, that we would often rather remove ourselves from the situation, or, instead, we resort to well-meaning but pointless platitudes. ‘Ancient wisdom’ we sometimes call it, but thought-killing cliché is another way of saying it. Things like ‘time heals the scars’, ‘you’ll get through it’, or ‘life goes on’. Such comments are stand-off-ish, because what you are actually saying is: ‘Hurry up! Get better soon!’, and, by doing that, you are denying the person’s grief. It is important to acknowledge grief, and to accept that it isn’t going to go away soon. Try not to give advice or talk about your own experiences, unless the person asks you to. The most important thing is to listen and to show that you are there.

WHAT IF YOU ARE GRIEVING?

- Give yourself permission to grieve
  Be kind to yourself, and accept that it will be a while before you get back to 100%. Grieving takes up a lot of energy and it is hard work, which takes a toll on your mind and body. It can make an ordinary day quite intense. Make sure you get enough rest, and don’t feel guilty if you can’t handle those ‘ordinary’ tasks. It is only normal to worry about falling behind on a given task or missing a deadline. So it can help to ask for support, from People & Organisation for example.

- Decide whether or not you are comfortable to talk about your loss
  Do you like it when your colleagues ask how you are? Or is the loss still too painful to talk about? Give your colleagues or manager a ‘heads up’ on how you feel about it. This will give them the chance to consider your needs.

- Don’t be afraid to ask for help
  It is not always easy for the people around you to see exactly what you need. Is it a good, long talk, or some help with your work? Discuss it with your colleagues, tell your boss or speak to a confidant about it (see further).

- Take your time
  Getting back to work is a process. Things go well some days, and you are ready to take on the world. Then you relapse the next day and things go badly. That is entirely normal, and a part of the grieving process. Do not put yourself under too much pressure, and make time for yourself when you need it. It is important to readjust your work schedule to suit your needs. Prioritise your own well-being.

VUB initiatives on grief and loss can be found at this website: Compassionate University | Vrije Universiteit Brussel (vub.be). For example, VUB holds an annual remembrance service at the monument of troost or comfort. You can find support at the ‘Monument of Comfort’ on Etterbeek campus, a spot where you can always take time out for yourself.